Today in History

Patriot Day occurs on September 11 of each year, designated in memory of the 2,977 killed in the 2001 terrorist attacks. By presidential decree, the American flag is flown at half-staff at the White House and on all U.S. government buildings and establishments throughout the world; flags are also encouraged to be displayed on individual American homes. Because Patriot Day is not a federal holiday, schools and business do not close in observance of the occasion, although memorial ceremonies for the victims are held.

Remembrance

September 10, 2001
I was five,
an innocent child,
who enjoyed the life with confidence.
A happy child
thought everyone was loved everyday.

September 11, 2001
I was only five,
an innocent child,
who witnessed the hatred, fear, anger
,and sorrowful feelings.
A panicked child
lost faith in humanity
overnight.

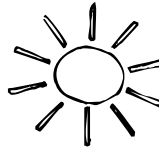

September 12, 2001
I was still only five,
an experienced child,
who cried about this life with fear.
A heartbroken child,
with a sad in heart
forever.

-Sierra McConville, September 2013

MY EXPERIENCE

For so many of us, September 11, 2001 doesn't seem over a decade old, but still a memory that is clear; as if it happened yesterday. I remember arriving at 8:45 to Ms Peggy's classroom in New York City. Teachers were talking in a state of urgency. My teacher called our attention and said with sad eyes, "Time for you all to go home, spend time with your family". My Aunt Liz got my cousins, brother and me. We didn't know of the severity of the situation. My aunt pulled my shirt and looked at my sternly and I could see she was afraid. When we walked out of the building I saw police, soldiers, and fire fighters. I was told we needed to walk all the way to the Bronx. I complained. On the walk I was told of what happened. I was shell-shocked. We went to Bronx to see our grandmother. It was one sorrow day for us all. -Kristin Williams
